Question: I am very concerned for our country and the new president [Trump]. I feel he is unstable, and the people he has put in his cabinet are the kind of people that will agree with him on his policies and take us back to the place we were 20 or 30 years ago, with many barriers for minorities, abortions, LBGT rights, women's rights, and environmental issues. I think the disparity between the rich and poor will become much greater. I am also concerned about our alliances and their attitudes toward us with the current policy on immigration. Am I misjudging him? Will he, in fact, carry us forward?

Light Beings: We can only say that it will be a rather unstable time for the next few months but there will be some massive swings in the government and the way the congress will work together. Due to the extremes of Trump's choices, there will be many that will decide that the political party they belong to may not be as important as preserving many of the steps forward that have been achieved in the past years. There will come a time when Trump will no longer have the say as he seems to have at this time. There will be change, and exactly how that will play out is not yet been decided. He has the chance to examine his methods and understand that he cannot continue with his present style of management, that he is no longer running a business, but is in a position that is governed by the people of the country and he cannot run roughshod over the many and ignore the dissension that he is building. There will be a time when he either will step down by choice, or no choice, or he will begin to see a better way of working with others and there can be some movement forward once again to correct the huge disparity that has developed. He has done one thing that may be a positive for the country in general, and that is by being such an extreme in decisions, he has caused many to awaken and recognize they can no longer remain the silent majority, but must step up and speak their mind and make moves to correct or dissuade decisions that are not good for the all.

It is a time when the rising vibration of the planet is also creating some chaos, because many are not aware of the necessary changes needed in both lifestyle and beliefs to accommodate the changing vibration of the planet and the increase of the same vibration in the human entity. It is time now for a radical change in both governments and businesses, and the individual will find that they can no longer ignore the needed changes. It must start with the individual. Those that do not recognize what is happening may find their lives are becoming more and more difficult in many ways, and it will usually be that which they need to recognize most will present itself in some sort of challenge. The darkness will strive to become more dominant and in those areas where it has a stronghold already there will be continued strife and many will suffer. Only those that recognize that they are not victims, but have choice, will be able to survive the chaos and destruction. Many of the events will cause great concern around your globe and again it will cause the countries that are much more of the light to gather their abilities and move forward in creating stronger alliances. This where the biggest challenge will be for Trump, because he is not one that sees the need to cooperate with others if it does not align with his idea of what is needed. If he does not open to new ways of thinking, and does not learn how to work better with others, and listen to their opinions, and act more in a cohesive way, he will not be allowed to remain in office. Ultimately there will a major shift, and the end result will be one that will benefit the many, instead of the few, as it presently seems to be doing around your entire globe.
